An interesting question is the influence of economic development on...
The Russo-Japanese War, 1904–1905
New Economic Policy (NEP)

The NEP (New Economic Policy) was introduced by Vladimir Lenin in 1921 to end the Russian Civil War and to modernize the economy. It aimed to use market mechanisms and private property to stimulate economic growth. The NEP allowed for the preservation of capitalist elements, such as the right to buy and sell, the independence of the workman, and the free distribution of goods. It also ended the war communism and the collective farm system.

The NEP was a significant step towards the eventual establishment of the Soviet Union, but it also faced criticism from both the left and right of the Communist party.

The NEP was a turning point in the development of the Soviet Union and its economy.